8. Henrik Lampén, Rogue Trader

Suddenly, a deafening thunder followed by a slight tremor aroused Cato from deep contemplation. Slowly, almost clumsy, the Captain of the Ultramarine 2nd company rose, stretching his stiff neck and flexing his shoulders. He was clad in full battle armor, as he had been since this campaign started a few weeks before. The last few days he had been careful of it's appearance, because he awaited a guest to whom no signs of weakness should be revealed.

His mind was tired, his spirit was serious and he mumbled silently 'They are here, may the Primarch guide me on this venture'

He forced himself to take on the role and appearance of the commander and went out of his chamber. He found Brother Tobelian on post outside and gave him the order to assemble the men, a small battle group tasked for this very unusual mission. Cato Sicarius took the lead, followed by 45 warriors. They marched out in the dark surroundings towards the agreed meeting point. Always imposing the impression of being in absolute balance, absolute control, Cato did not falter in appearance. None of the warriors around him noticed that their Captain was indeed far from balanced, nor did he feel any comforting control. The plan he had schemed for so long, was sound, logical, purposeful, but not exactly aligned to codex astarters, -unless you spent some extra thought of the potential gain it would bring.

To Cato, it was obvious that the future of the chapter should not be violated by the command of Captain Agemman. Cato was perhaps not in a traditionally viewed position to inherit the rank of Chapter Master, but who could deny that he was the one most suited for the task? This mission had the potential of sealing a fortunate future for the whole Chapter. Nevertheless, the sparks of insecurity disturbed him.

The fog was thick when they approached the meeting point. As they progressed, a greenish light grew stronger. The outlines of a building-sized vessel took form in the dense jungle.

... and there he was. An Arch-Enemy. A figure made of shining steel, sporting a man-sized scythe and a visage totally devoid of emotions. The Vargard. Standing in front of a group of hulking machineoids, en lighted in green from the enormous transport the had arrived in. The sound of his voice was surprisingly soft, rather peaceful and uncomfortably relaxed for a non living being. 'Greetings, master Captain of the 2nd Company. I have my requisites at hand, I assume you are equally well prepared?'

'Yes, it is here'

And then, two devices of unknown, peculiar shape and form switched hands in the shrouding mist deep in the jungle at Istrophedia VII. One being useful to defeat a rival, the other to cure the mind of a very old soul. This was a delicate situation for both commanders, especially regarding the nature of each other's counterpart.

So, when the jungle suddenly went ablaze with flames and an assault roar hollowed in close quarter, Cato and the Varguard instantaneously made the same decision: kill the unknown first, then the other.

18. Peter Aslén – Chaos Deamons

A big smile ran across the face of Ku´Gath Plaguefather as he took another vile and emptied it into the cauldron. He laughed, just as Nurgle himself had laughed all those eternities ago when Ku´Gath had fallen into the cauldron.

– Ahh, it is done. This plague will make Grandfather proud. I am getting closer to the finished product. This one needs testing.

Said Ku´Gath as he got up onto his palanquin. Seven hundred and seventy seven tiny laughs came from under him, the nurglings all fought like the children they were about who would carry him the most. Another smile across Ku´Gath's face appeared.

He grabbed a handful of the nurglings skipping about his laboratory atop his palanquin and dipped them all into the cauldron as they chattered and giggled. He threw them across the field at what appeared to be a Death Guard Astartes chained to a dead tree. As they hit the Astartes (with high-pitched giggles) he started to grow large boulds and pus came gushing from his helmet before he melted away. Ku´Gath laughed and said;

– If it can kill Death Guard, the human servants of Grandfather, then it can kill all.

Ku´Gath was wearing his biggest smile yet. All of a sudden he started to repeat words not of this reality, heavy words uttered in some kind of verse. A large portal opened in front of him. Through it walked hordes of plaguebearers, huge plague toads and even Rot flies came flying through. A large Soul Grinder was the last to come through the portal before it closed.

– Yes my pretties, yeeees.. It is time to test our...

He stopped talking. Someone was missing. His eyes ran across the host of daemons before him until he realized who it was.

- Epidemius! WHERE IS EPIDEMIUS!!!?

Ku´Gath yelled with such force that the portal re-opened and through it came a large herald of Nurgle, he too was being carried aloft a palanquin (albeit smaller) and in his hand he held an hourglass.

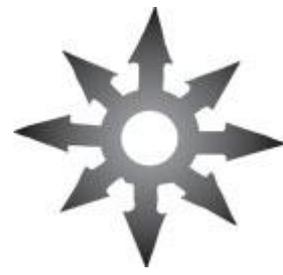

- Apologies for my lateness my lord. The Death Guard Typhus and his pesky Astartes have kept me busy.

- Typhus...that...human is not worth our time. We have work to do.

A final smile appeared on Ku´Gath's face as he opened a new portal.

- Come my pretties! For Grandfather Nurgle!

He yelled as the host of daemons all marched through the portal. No mortal realm can withstand the force of Ku´Gath Plaguefather and his minions...
